iSPIRT to tap start-up ideas for the underserved

ALNOOR PEERMOHAMED
Bengaluru, 19 August

iSPIRT, the volunteer organisation behind India Stack, is looking to tap disruptive ideas from start-ups in smaller towns to build services for the underserved population in areas such as financial inclusion, health care and education.

So far, India Stack which promotes a paperless, cashless and consent-based digital economy, has only been adopted by large enterprises such as governments, telecom and banking providers. Moreover, these players merely use the services of India Stack as enablers rather than innovating around them.

"The key thing we're looking for is innovative solutions from the small guys and that's the focus of this competition. The big guys are adopting many parts of the India Stack, because it serves their needs," said Sanjay Jain, chief innovation officer, Centre for Innovation Incubation and Entrepreneurship at IIM Ahmedabad.

To this end, iSPIRT is organising a competition to find the most disruptive users of the India Stack among early stage start-ups, with the lure of giving them exposure to the VC community. The #BuildOnIndiaStack competition will aim to find the best ideas that will serve households in the country earning below ₹3 lakh per annum and empowering them economically.

With the number of entries being in "three digits" Jain expects to see a fair amount of representation from teams or companies based in smaller towns. Being closer to the actual problems of people earning less than the top 15 per cent of the country's population will give such companies an edge in solving India's biggest issues.
